MANHATTAN'S upper crust were tight-lipped about Ghislaine Maxwell when a team of BBC filmmakers hit town, we hear.

Sources tell Page Six that producers of an upcoming BBC documentary on Jeffrey Epstein's alleged madam and her late, shamed press baron dad, Robert Maxwell, were in the Big Apple to interview subjects this month.

We hear the filmmakers managed to land an interview with David Boies — an attorney for Epstein's victims — as well as various business associates of Robert.

But high society types who once rubbed elbows with jailed Ghislaine and Epstein are running scared and keeping mum, sources said.

An insider told us: "All members of higher society in New York refused to talk to the BBC. Some people are buying the copyrights to photos both in London and New York to remove the pictures from the market that shows them with Ghislaine and/or Epstein."

Another said: "I bet that people in NYC high society aren't lining up to speak to the BBC."

However, producers of the three-part film — who were in town earlier this month — plan to return, we hear. "The Fall of the House of Maxwell" won't air until after Ghislaine's upcoming trial in November. The project was commissioned by BBC Two, and is being made via Expectation Factual.

We hear Boies was interviewed at Hudson Yards, where a source said the legal eagle "stressed he feels the US government has a very strong case against Ghislaine."

The production could interview Boies again when it returns, as well as his colleague Sigrid McCawley, we hear.

A BBC rep did not comment. The film is one of a number of projects involving Ghislaine to hit TV screens, including Vicky Ward's upcoming Discovery+ doc "Chasing Ghislaine," and Peacock's "Epstein's Shadow: Ghislaine Maxwell." Maxwell is charged with recruiting teens for Epstein to abuse between 1994 and 2004. She has pleaded not guilty.

"Gone Girl" actress Rosamund Pike has gone crimson for her paparazzi walk in a glamorous tulle gown Saturday evening on the final night of Cannes.

Lil' Brit cheeky

OH those incorrigible Brits. English sculptor Andrew Logan risked making his compatriots choke on their tea on a recent Zoom event for the Museum of Arts and Design. Fellow Brit Dame Zandra Rhodes interviewed longtime chum Logan for members of the museum and asked what he was doing with his time. "I'm continuously making love all day," he said. Perhaps to the relief of some, he elaborated: "I'm working on a 5-foot mirrored sculpture called 'Love' for my museum in Wales. So when we have weddings here, people can stand next to it. It's all encompassing."

RONALDINHO is legendary for two things: playing soccer and partying. And he may have retired from the pitch, but it seems he's kept his clubbing skills honed. Ronaldinho (above) was seen at Miami nightclub Vendôme's Monday party. According to a source, he "arrived at 12:30 a.m. with a few friends and was seen ordering expensive magnums of rosé Champagne. There were three parades of Champagne and tequila to his table throughout the night. Everyone wanted to party with him."

There once was a man from Nantucket

BILLIONAIRE former Google exec Eric Schmidt, 66, may be squiring around a much-younger love interest to parties — but he's also been posing for magazine covers with his wife, Wendy. The little-known couple, who've been married 40-plus years, appear on the cover of this month's N Magazine, smiling in summer gear by the sea. An accompanying photo spread in the Nantucket glossy shows them posing on the beach and walking arm-in-arm along the shore. "The Nantucket spread is a public display of their ongoing relationship," a source points out. The article delves into Eric and Wendy's philanthropic efforts, making them out to be the power couple most likely to take over the mantle of the divorcing Bill and Melinda Gates. Titled "Global Changemakers," the piece discusses the work of the Schmidt Family Foundation, which Wendy has overseen as president since 2006. Last week, Page Six reported Schmidt has been seen escorting young tech entrepreneur Michelle Ritter, 27, to exclusive events. Eric's past girlfriends include Alexandra Duisberg, p.r. exec Marcy Simon, journalist Kate Bohner, Council on Foreign Relations communications VP Lisa Shields, pianist Cho-San Nguyen and socialite Ulla Parker, though it seems through them all — he'll be sticking with Wendy. A rep for Schmidt previously declined to comment on his new relationship.
